Welcome to How to Make a Story Map, an instructional video on reading comprehension brought to you by the Excelsior College Online Writing Lab.

Have you ever read a story and forgotten or been confused about its major elements?

A good way to keep track of the major elements of a story is to construct a story map.

You can do this either during or after you read.

Story maps can help you identify the major elements of a story.

You can use one whether you’re describing a fictional story or a true story.

And a story map can help you remember this information later, when it comes time to write or study.

In this example, we’ll construct a story map for Kate Chopin’s “The Story of an Hour.”

First, write down the title and the author or authors of the story.

After that, list the characters, making a note of the main characters.

Describe the setting—the place and time of the story.

Next, list the main events in chronological order.

Louise learns of her husband’s death as a result of a railroad disaster. She locks herself up in her room and privately rejoices as she ponders a life of freedom. Ironically, the other characters believe she is grieving and worry she might make herself ill. Louise finds out her husband is still alive and dies of grief. Ironically, the other characters believe she died of a heart attack resulting from the joy of learning that her husband was still alive.

Then, describe the major conflict that drives the story and the resolution achieved at the end.

Conflict: Louise struggles to define her identity, hopes, and dreams within her marriage. She feels both joy and guilt when she learns of her husband’s death.

Resolution: She dies of grief upon hearing the news that her husband is still alive.
